Thinking through others: prosthetic fantasy and the cultural moment.
Farrell, Kirby , 1942-
The Massachusetts Review (Mass Rev) v. 37 (Summer '96) p. 213-35
WORD COUNT:  9466

ABSTRACT:  The writer reflects on how we live through ongoing efforts to ground the self in the world through internalization. He notes that in psychoanalytic terms the child's internalization of the parent's voice is a transference, but he points out that the child is also using the parent as an extension of herself so as to extend her reach and amplify her power. He considers how the process works at the level of whole cultures, such as ancient Greece and early modern England. He suggests that periods of unusual stress are marked by extraordinary efforts to devise a convincing ground for identity, arguing that the religious strife of the early modern period, for example, was among other things a competition to validate cosmic voices. He applies the concept of prosthetic relationships to the current preoccupation with childhood abuse.
